

Action alert: Contact companies that are funding the use of aborted fetal cell lines to test their flavor enhancers

An often overlooked facet of the aborticide industry is the sale of human body parts harvested from babies who are in the process of being aborted. Senomyx, a biotech company that produces artificial flavor enhancers, uses aborted fetal cell lines to test their products.

In 2010, the pro-life organization Children of God for Life (CGL) wrote to Senomyx CEO Kent Snyder, pointing out that moral options for testing their food additives could and should be used. When Senomyx ignored their letter, they wrote to the companies Senomyx listed on their website as "collaborators" and urged them to stop funding the unethical research. Within hours of a news release by CGL, Campbell Soup severed their ties with Senomyx. Food giants Pepsico, Kraft Foods, Solae and Nestlé are continuing their collaborative partnership with Senomyx. CGL is currently calling on the public to boycott products of those companies that still fund the research by Senomyx.

"If enough people voice their outrage and intent to boycott these consumer products, it can be highly effective in convincing Senomyx to change their methods", said Debi Vinnedge, Executive Director for CGL, quoted in a LifeSiteNews.com article.

Prayers are requested that the hearts of those who are supporting this immoral research be turned to the Giver of life. Contacting the companies involved is also encouraged. Their contact information is:
